

Parliament

| Definition | The Parliament typeface pays homage to medieval ceremonial manuscripts. It represents the pinnacle of Menhart's calligraphic skills and his virtuosity in converting handwritten morphology into type. Parliament is Oldřich Menhart's ceremonial typeface, based on models from early Renaissance humanist manuscripts. It feels calligraphed, with a soft, flexible pen with a straight nib. The distinctive breaking of rounded strokes and the bending of straight stems is particularly eye-catching in the details. In text sizes it stands out for its picturesqueness, good readability and its delicate, semi-cursive temperament. The National Assembly commissioned Menhart to design a ceremonial typeface for the Czechoslovak constitution in mid-1950. Menhart delivered the first designs with the working title of Republika as early as July 12, 1950, and on September 28, 1950 he submitted all 95 drawings of individual characters under the official name of Parliament. In the years 1950—1951, the typeface was cut and cast by the type foundry of the State Printing Office in Prague in a single 16-point size. Two additional sizes of figures and plate initials in the form of enlarged majuscules are the only decoration of the Constitution of the Czechoslovak Republic, which is probably also the only print where this typeface was used; the metal letters were probably melted down right after the print. The original brass matrices remained as the property of the National Assembly (Archives of the Parliament of the Czech Republic). |

Life pulsates in the classic contours of the typeface.
But it takes considerable sensitivity and insight to understand the mysterious flow in the letterforms. Otherwise, working about type can easily degenerate into an unconscious act or mistake.
